It is primarily due to renal hypoperfusion or acute tubular necrosis, with a prevalence in critically ill patients of around 20%. This entity is associated with a mortality between 30% and 90% in those with AKI of stage 3, and higher in patients with more severe AKI. Mortality is related to the presence of comorbidities, the severity of the underlying illness and the presence of dialysis. Patients with AKI of stage 2 or 3 should be treated with protective measures aimed to treat or prevent systemic complications of the illness and the direct renal damage (fluid restriction, diuresis, alkalinization of the urine, treatment of heart failure and electrolyte abnormalities). For patients with AKI of stage 3, a continuous renal replacement therapy should be started if the renal function does not recover or the patient remains oliguric.
