Schizophrenia is a severe psychiatric disorder affecting at least 1% of the population and is severely debilitating. The primary symptoms of schizophrenia are psychosis (hallucinations and delusions), thought disorder (disorganized speech, and sustained derailment of thought) and social withdrawal. Evidence suggests that the genetic factors contributing to the pathogenesis of this complex disease are of a polygenic nature and involve relatively common alleles having small effects. Furthermore, the major form of inheritance appears to be a multifactorial or complex mode of inheritance. Although symptomatically similar, there is substantial diversity among patients with schizophrenia, and stratification of the disease by this variability has not been productive. Accumulating data suggest that the diagnosis of schizophrenia is variable, with inconsistent prognosis and long term course. Invasive procedures are often used to study schizophrenia but these techniques are of great discomfort to the patient. The diagnostic criteria used to diagnose schizophrenic patients are based on a behavioral expression of the illness that is subjective and dependent on the individuals knowledge and understanding of themselves and others. Therefore, it is important to develop noninvasive measurements to quantify characteristic behaviors associated with the disease and contribute to the understanding of its pathophysiology. Previously, we have shown that salivation during sleep in schizophrenia is abnormal and associated with positive psychotic symptoms and hallucinations. During the last grant period, we have found that the neural structures associated with abnormally suppressed saliva are related to positive psychotic symptoms, implying that this abnormality is responsible for the salivation as well as the psychotic state. Also, preliminary analyses suggest that not only positive symptoms but negative symptoms may

The critical flicker frequency test (CFF) has been developed as a new, portable, device to facilitate the identification of visual impairment. We compared the CFF results with the achromatic (AChL) and photopic (PL) luminance threshold and the subjective visual functions test (SVFT) for 86 patients with glaucoma. We also compared the test results for a group of 89 people with normal vision with the findings for a group of 85 subjects with glaucoma. All subjects underwent a battery of ocular tests in which the CFF, the PL and AChL threshold were measured on three days. Moreover, each subject completed a revised form of the SVFT. The results of a significant test-retest reliability for the three tests for the group of 89 subjects with normal vision and 85 subjects with glaucoma were satisfactory, with intraclass correlation coefficients of 0.91 for the CFF; 0.94 for the PL; and 0.96 for the AChL. There was a strong correlation between the results of the CFF and c9d1549cdd
