ist Dispatch, July 10 The future is not a constant. An institution of sorts, "The future" is a lens for viewing the present; a perspective that the present fits within. It is a way of telling what came from what and why it happened this way. The lens distorts the truth, however. I'm not suggesting that we can never ever know; most likely not. Distortion happens every time a lens is applied to the world, but a lens is precisely what we are. The manifestation of a lens is a collection of generalizations over a set of observations. For many people, it has been built out of visual responses over decades. The lens' product is typically a sense of understanding the world around them. This understanding is built from each observation, and is built on the external measurements of these observations. Our actual perception of the world therefore is our response to the same information through its lens. It becomes obvious, in as far as one admits to being aware, that this lens is not entirely true. For example, it might be that technology gives certain things such as current job security a higher value than other things such as work ethic and community organization...but there is a strong counter argument. Still, almost everyone brings to bear their perspective on the world through this lens in some way, because until people started paying attention to this question, it was assumed that our perspective was simply a "reality." Our own sense of life was consistent, at least sort of. It took research to begin to see it was more complex than that. Sure, the shorthand answers were true or false but it wasn't that easy. There is more than one way to organize the world and think about it. I've learned a lot of that in the past ten years. There has been a lot of research into how it is that we think, and a lot of it comes down to three main ideas for how we think. In common nomenclature, these are reductionism, functionalism, and post-structuralism. They are concepts in their own rights, and the ideas are often followed closely by the list of authors whose work helps to define them. It is worth understanding these things for at least the idea of a fragmentalist perspective. Also, our life expectancy, and perhaps more importantly our monthly spending on medical care, has continued to increase, even in areas where life expectancy has decreased. This is an effect of ◆
