Donald Trump is now the Republican presidential candidate. Following dismal results last week in New Hampshire and South Carolina, his rivals are already out of the race. And he is now in a strong position to win the nomination outright, or to face the likely Democratic nominee, Hillary Clinton, in November. So when it comes to some things, including voting systems, one would have expected some of the Republican Party's leading lights to step in and place their stamp of approval on one candidate or the other. But Donald Trump is not the only candidate to have raised fears that they might not accept the result of the popular vote. Image copyright EPA All the major party candidates have "pledged" their support to impartiality. Trump, notably, has now gone one step further, promising to "accept the election results". At least 13 other Republican contenders have similarly vowed to accept the result. Most of these pledges are hollow, given the candidates' total lack of credibility on this issue. But a number of people on Twitter have been campaigning for a more formal pledge. A judge last year ruled in Florida, where voting machines were at the centre of a controversy, that the state's Republican governor was wrong to refuse to accept the result of the vote and for ordering recounts. What is to stop a candidate from refusing to accept the result of the election and refuse to take part in the recount? What obligations does the federal government have in these circumstances? "The situation as we envisage it would be one where the president-elect would be forced to accept a decision that was made by the citizens of Florida and others in the United States in an election which they have witnessed and which has taken place," says Anthony Pollina, executive director of the Berkeley Institute for Justice and Democracy. "This is not something that would be permitted in other countries that have a democratic form of government but it would be the exception rather than the rule in the United States." Only one American state, California, has its own rules on its citizens accepting an election result. As
