Why Microsoft Excel's Locking Stink - swombat ===== dhimes A month ago I was hanging around at the gym, when a very nice older gentleman took over the machine for a set. I tried to make a joke about what a distraction he was, and he looked at me oddly and said "really? Do you think I don't notice you staring at me all the time?" I felt bad. He noticed me and the other guy a little too much, but neither of us took it to heart.

----- kajeet Sorry about the formatting. I should have said 'sockpuppet' instead of 'genius revolver'. Anyways, I don't think the guy who wrote the blog got his inspiration from Knuth -- he seems to be going for something more 'muscle memory' -- as in 'I haven't used it, so I don't get it.' I don't think that's the best way to 'stifle innovation,' but I really don't think that's the point. ~~~ cookiecaper Like the image example, I think the sentiment is generally true that it is not good if a keyboard shortcut exists that is similar to one already on the keyboard that provides a much more efficient means of data entry. I think the sentiment is also generally true for users who never use a mouse. People do all kinds of stupid things with a mouse, particularly keyboard-first users when they have complex forms with lots of buttons. It would be rare that a keyboard-only user would think, "Oh, I didn't realize there was a shortcut to do that," but imagine that a keyboard user uses the space bar to input text and then later discovers that there is a keystroke that triggers the calculation they wanted to trigger with the space bar. I am not advocating for or against the "keyboard shortcut," though; it's precisely because of the potential for having a "just missed it" window of discovery that I don't think there should be one. Many people use a keyboard to input data, and I think those people should use their keyboard as effectively as possible. ----- 6d1f23a050
