I just tried working with the new-style "tabs" in Thunderbird, and I really like them. I really don't like the idea of having to rely on add-ons to do my basic job of keeping organized with inboxes. Is there a reason that the designers of the new UI didn't take advantage of already implemented mechanisms like a tabbed window? Why did it have to be this way? I really have no idea how it happened, and I don't recall hearing about anyone complaining about it. As I said, I like the new way of doing it because it's simpler and it works well for me, but that doesn't seem to be the intended approach. It's a little odd to be adding new features to an existing tool, and I think the UI designers should have tried to find a way to make the tool better with the existing tool, instead of starting over from scratch. I'm asking because the new way seems very cumbersome and limiting, like I was using a tool in isolation. Clearly they are using some sort of tabbed window tool, but I'd like to know what happened to the tools I am actually familiar with, and why it is that the designers couldn't have easily added those features to the existing UI. A: Note: The OP was unable to identify the source of the "Original Question". Official Mozillazine article about the tabs feature A: Well, new technologies often come with their problems.
